TITLE: Negotiating Voices in English as a Lingua Franca: Indonesian multilingual identity in English Digital Interactions

ABSTRACT: Despite the existence of many studies on the identity of language learners in offline settings, few focuses on how English learners in the expanding circle construct their identity through English use and choices over their first language capital as they enjoy variations of multilinguacultural exposes in the digital space. To fill this gap, this present study explores the voices of 267 Indonesians in negotiating their identity as English learners and users. Drawing on poststructuralist approach and positioning theory of identity, the study shows how socio-cultural values and a hegemony which posits L1 users as the most rightful language model become sensitive factors affecting their choices of languages, accent-preferences, and desire to affiliate with diverse multilinguacultural persons in digital interactions. The article calls for the encouragement of translanguaging as discursive practice in the classrooms and beyond. Additionally societal stigma on the existence and use of English which limits the identity options of Indonesian learners as users of English in the expanding circle should be responded strongly in digital interaction as well as offline encounters.
